A Look at Today's Anxious Parents

“There has been a rising tide of anxiety and consumerism among parents...And we have also seen a lot of new reasons that people are anxious—they’re less able to control their child’s future.”

Psychologist and School Consultant

In our research on today’s independent school parents, heads of school perceived parents to be more anxious than ever, with two-thirds agreeing that parent anxiety has increased.<sup>1</sup> Indeed, today’s Generation X and Millennial parents are concerned about many aspects of their children’s futures and seek to be in control as much as possible given the uncertainty of today’s world.

Independent schools are seeing parent anxiety manifest in several ways. First, parents seek to be involved or have control over many aspects of their children’s learning and development at school. This can be seen as parents asking more questions about what is being taught in the curriculum or worrying that their children aren’t taking the “right” courses to get into college. Next, parents may seek certain outcomes for their children, as they worry about their trajectories if they do not receive top grades or become star athletes. In some cases, parents’ anxieties lead to more extreme behaviors, like demanding changes to transcripts or challenging athletic coaches’ decisions. When not proactively addressed by the school, minor issues can escalate quickly into bigger concerns that must be addressed by school administrators.

Unfortunately, our research indicates that most independent schools’ current approach to parents leads to certain shortcomings when it comes to addressing parent issues early.

A New Approach to Parent Concerns

Current Approach Leads to Shortcomings in Relationships with the Majority of Parents

Most independent schools passively wait for parent concerns to surface, which often means that issues are brought up immediately only by those vocal “5 percenters”—parents who are quick to express their unhappiness and often difficult to please. The parent majority, on the other hand, is often too busy or not sufficiently engaged to do so.

As a result, administrators miss the chance to nip their issues in the bud, allowing them to become full-blown problems by the time they’re addressed, which risks creating unproductive partnerships<sup>1</sup>.

Schools Wait for Parent Concerns to Surface...

- Parent issues voiced early only by most vocal
- Majority too busy or not sufficiently engaged to surface issues right away

...Allowing Problems to Escalate

- Administrators miss chance to promptly address minor matters
- Escalated issues risk contributing to unproductive partnerships

Rather than focusing primarily on the needs of the vocal parents who raise their hands, take the temperature of ALL parents to surface issues early, before they have the chance to escalate.

Assess Parent Concerns Through Surveys

While many independent schools send out surveys periodically related to specific subjects or events where they are seeking parent input, regularly soliciting feedback from parents on their everyday experience with the school is not a common practice. As straightforward as it may seem, using quick and easy online surveys provides a methodical way of gathering parent feedback and serves to demonstrate your commitment to meeting the needs of your parents as valued partners within the school community.

In the next section, we introduce the four key elements of designing, implementing, and assessing parent feedback surveys at your school.

1) Defined in our research as parent relationships characterized by grievances and dissatisfaction with the school, in spite of the school’s best efforts.

Parent Feedback Surveys: The Four Key Elements

EAB recommends integrating four key elements into parent feedback survey design and implementation, as outlined below.

A Light Lift for Parents

First, make giving feedback easy to do.

- Design the survey to be quick and simple to complete (ideally 5-10 questions) so that even the busiest of parents can respond.
- Email the survey directly to parents' inboxes, rather than directing them to an online portal or secondary site.

Timely Deployment

Third, make it timely.

- Solicit feedback consistently. We recommend once a quarter to keep the survey regular without risking it becoming an email that is too frequent and gets ignored in inboxes.
- Deploy additional surveys as needed to gauge parents' feelings on controversies or crises when they arise at your institution.

All Parents Surveyed

Second, include everybody.

- Send the survey to all parents in the school community to be sure that not just the most vocal parents raise issues that get attention.
- Give parents the option to include their names so that you can respond to them personally, as needed.
- Determine whether you want the same survey to be sent to all parents or whether you want to alter it by division. (Note that the latter option requires more effort by parents with multiple children enrolled at your school.)

Results Utilized Intentionally

Finally, strategically assess and respond to results.

- Have the leadership team review results and prioritize how best to respond to individual issues.
- Look for larger trends in the feedback that can be addressed through parent education or formal communication to calm bigger sources of anxiety within the community.
- Periodically share survey results at a high-level with parents to show how the school is responding to their feedback. Highlight positive comments as well.

Case Study: The Pingry School's Parent Survey

An excellent example of a school using surveys to monitor parent feedback comes from The Pingry School, a co-ed K-12 school in Basking Ridge, New Jersey.

The Pingry School's Survey Approach

During the pandemic, the school began sending out a 5-question form to gather parent feedback on virtual learning. The survey was sent through the weekly parent newsletter to regularly collect parent input during the early days of the COVID-19 crisis.

Sample questions are provided below.

Sample Questions

1. On a scale of 1 to 5, how satisfied are you with your child's OVERALL EXPERIENCE at Pingry Anywhere?

Very      Very dissatisfied 1 2 3 4 5 Satisfied

2. Additional comments about your satisfaction with your child's OVERALL EXPERIENCE: _____

3. *As best you can, respond to the following:
My child is engaged.*

Strongly      Strongly
Disagree 1 2 3 4 5 Agree

4. *As best you can, respond to the following:
My child is able to foster relationships with teachers.*

Strongly      Strongly
Disagree 1 2 3 4 5 Agree

5. *As best you can, respond to the following:
My child able to navigate Google Classroom (including accessing links, coursework, assignments, etc.)*

Strongly      Strongly
Disagree 1 2 3 4 5 Agree

Short and to the point, the survey was used to take a quick temperature check of how parents and their children were feeling about the Pingry virtual experience.

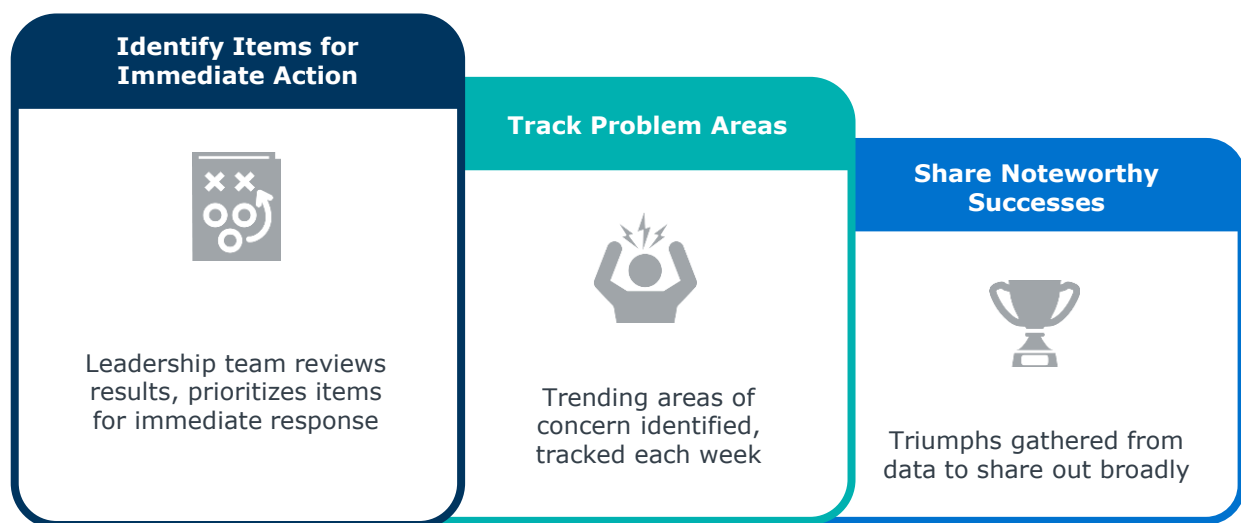

Pingry sent out separate surveys created for lower, and middle and upper school families. The survey for lower school parents was a bit longer and covered a wider range of topics, since it was geared toward parents who were more involved with their children's day-to-day schooling. All parents were given the option to complete it anonymously or provide their names, which was particularly useful if the school needed to respond to a parent concern.

Assessment of Survey Results

Pingry prioritized having the school leadership team review the survey data each week it was collected. The results were compiled by division and used for three main purposes:

1. First, the team identified areas where they needed to take immediate action based on the feedback's urgency and importance (e.g., a major concern raised by a parent).
2. Second, they noted larger trends and emerging issues to keep an eye on (see example below).
3. Third, they gathered stories of success to share with the broader community.

Identifying and Addressing Parent Concerns

One example of a high-priority item that emerged from the survey was the fact that many students were feeling the toll of the pandemic on their mental health and stress levels. The leadership team identified a trend in parent responses about students missing out on the social element of school, even when they were back on campus. After several weeks of this feedback, the school began incorporating what they called “moments of joy” into the student experience, such as food trucks or ice cream socials on campus. These events also had the added benefit of giving school counselors the chance for increased interaction with students.

Over time, the school was able to see how the “moments of joy” initiative contributed to boosting attendance among students in the upper school, who began to come in more often by choice to engage with peers. Not only was Pingry better able to support its students, but this anecdote shows how asking for parent feedback enabled the school to listen to its customers and directly respond to concerns before they escalated further.
